The kōura Aggressive Portfolio is up 7.1% over the past year, and is up 7.5% p.a. annualised over 2 years. This is following a rather significant 6.5% pull back during the month of January.

Global markets fell significantly in January as investors reacted to concerns over rising inflation. US inflation was reported at 7.5% in early January which confirmed to investors that Central Banks will need to accelerate their path of interest rate normalisation. It is no longer a question of if, and when they will raise rates, but it is a question of how fast they will move.

For a long time, asset prices have been buoyed by low interest rates and it now appears that those days might be over. The most impacted companies are technology stocks whose valuations are predicated on significant earnings growth. Higher interest rates make those earnings less valuable which has resulted in their valuations falling.

Emerging Markets had a stronger month than other markets due to their current valuation fundamentals. They had a tough 2021, so a significant amount of the bad news was already priced in, and higher interest rates have not fundamentally changed the story.

One standout market in the month was the UK (sits in our Rest of World Fund). The market was one of the few positive markets due largely to the makeup of its market. The UK market is a very traditional market with a significant exposure to energy, resources and consumer discretionary stocks all of which are currently doing very well. For the first time in a while it is beneficial to have a small technology exposure in the stock market.
